LGBT neighborhoods favor Buttigieg, then Harris

BY LISA KEEN
KEEN NEWS SERVICE

This may not be a surprise, but it is news: Openly gay presidential candidate Pete Buttigieg has outraised his Democratic competitors in most heavily LGBT neighborhoods around the country.

And he is now the third most successful fundraiser among the 22 viable candidates for the Democratic nomination. But the data—and an examination of who has given money—suggests that the LGBT community is keeping significant support behind other major Democratic presidential candidates and that the community’s potential has much room for growth.

According to Federal Election Commission’s reports through the second quarter (June 30), Buttigieg had raised $32 million, behind U.S. Sens. Bernie Sanders ($46 million) and Elizabeth Warren ($35 million).

An analysis of dollars to Democratic candidates in 40 zip codes known to have heavily LGBT populations indicates that Buttigieg raked in 38 percent of the total dollars. He was followed by U.S. Sen. Kamala Harris (22 percent), Warren (18 percent), Sanders (13 percent) and former Vice President Joe Biden (9 percent).

Contributions in zip code areas considered heavily lesbian were a little different: 31 percent gave to Warren, 22 percent each to Buttigieg and Sanders; 19 percent to Harris and 5 percent to Biden.

Buttigieg was the top dollar collector in 23 of the 40 heavily gay zip codes.

In heavily LGBT zip codes where another Democratic candidate raised the most money, there was usually a home-state advantage. For instance, Warren, from Massachusetts, raised the most in Northampton and Wellesley, Massachusetts; Harris took two zip codes around Oakland, California; and former U.S. Rep. Beto O’Rourke (D-Texas) outraised everybody in the LGBT districts of Oaklawn in Dallas and Montrose in Houston.

But there were some surprises.

Warren was the top dollar fundraiser in three New York City zip codes. All three—Park Slope, Prospect Heights and Boerum Hill—have large concentrations of female same-sex households, according to Census records. She also won top dollar in the heavily LGBT neighborhood of Kiertown, Michigan, near Ann Arbor.

Buttigieg collected the most small-dollar donations from The Castro area of San Francisco. Of the roughly half-million dollars raised there, 42 percent went to Buttigieg, 29 percent to Harris and 16 percent to Warren.

Provincetown gave only $95,000 to Democratic candidates, but 86 percent of the small dollars went to Buttigieg (and 9 percent to Warren).

As a state, LGBT zip codes in Florida were more loyal to Buttigieg, giving 51 percent of their small dollar donations to him. Illinois had the second strongest preference for Buttigieg, giving 50 percent to Buttigieg.

Ah, the caveats!

These numbers do not mean that the LGBT vote is reliably behind Buttigieg.

First, the dollar counts are just that: dollars, not votes.

Second, not all LGBT people live in zip codes with heavily LGBT populations.

Third, some people who gave money to a Democratic candidate gave money to two or more candidates.

Also, the data on contributions by zip code represents only “small-dollar donations.” It originated with a Democratic political action committee that runs the fundraising website ActBlue. ActBlue provides a way for people who want to support Democratic candidates and organizations to give small-dollar amounts (less than $200) quickly and easily. In the first six months of 2019, the PAC raised $345 million that way.

Several major media organizations, such as the New York Times and the Los Angeles Times, have reported the ActBlue raw data from the FEC in ways that illustrate how well each Democrat is doing in getting individual donors and how well each is raising money in each zip code. The New York Times, for instance, discovered that Buttigieg has the third largest number of individual donors through ActBlue ($390,000). That puts him behind Sanders ($746,000) and Warren ($421,000) but ahead of Harris ($277,000) and Biden ($256,000).

When looking at FEC reports, which count both small-dollar contributions and contributions of $200 and above, Buttigieg’s raised $32 million, putting him in third behind Sanders ($46 million) and Warren ($36 million).

Finally, a search through FEC records for the names of individual LGBT leaders, well-known activists and celebrities found that only 19 of 100 had made a reportable contribution to any Democratic presidential candidate so far. Given that the FEC records the names of only those donors who give $200 or more, the other 81 might have given contributions of less than $200. Barringer that, the numbers suggest that LGBT leaders, generally speaking, are not yet ready to go “all in” behind one Democratic frontrunner just yet.

Of the 19 who had given to a Democrat:
—Only five had given the maximum ($2,800) to any one candidate for the primary. Former Assistant Secretary of the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development Roberta Achtenberg has given $2,800 to Harris and four others—celebrity comedian Ellen DeGeneres, film producer David Geffen, former president of the U.S. Export-Import Bank Fred Hochberg and current Fort Lauderdale Mayor Dean Trantalis—have all given $2,800 to Buttigieg.
—Six had given to Buttigieg and at least one other of the top tier candidates.

The next round of campaign fundraising reports is due into the FEC on Monday, Sept. 30. Meanwhile, the latest national polling shows Buttigieg may have slipped in the standings. In mid-June, a Fox News poll of more than 400 Democratic primary voters found the South Bend mayor at 8 percent. In mid-July, the Fox poll found him at 5. And in mid-August, he is tied with U.S. Sen. Cory Booker and businessman Andrew Yang at 3 percent. (The margin of error is plus-or-minus 4.5 percent.)

An averaging of all national polls calculated by RealClearPolitics.com shows Buttigieg still hanging on to fifth place with 5.2 percent of the vote, behind Biden (30.5 percent), Warren (17.3 percent), Sanders (16 percent) and Harris (8 percent).

Lighthouse plots protest strategies

BY MATT SIMONETTE

Community members, among them stakeholders from several Chicago-area religious organizations, gathered at Lighthouse Church in Lincoln Park the morning of Aug. 10 to discuss community engagement around Center on Halsted.

Rev. Jamie Frazier of Lighthouse—who also heads up the Lighthouse Foundation, which advocates equity issues on behalf of Black LGBT community members—is leading calls for the Center to fire its longtime security contractor, Walsh Security. The head of Walsh Security, Thomas Walsh, is a Chicago Police Department officer, who has faced allegations of racism.

Frazier emphasized that the key “target” of the protests is Center CEO Modesto Tico Valle.

“The buck stops with him, and [why] he continues to employ a racist, is just unfathomable to me,” Frazier said, adding that the central demands are Walsh’s dismissal and that Lighthouse and community allies be consulted in the hiring of Walsh’s replacement.

For more details on the protests, see http://www.windycitymediagroup.com/lgbt/EXCLUSIVE-Community-activists-launch-focus-on-Center-on-Halsted/66714.html.

Dorothy Brown not running for re-election

Longtime Cook County Circuit Court Clerk Dorothy Brown has announced that she will not be running for re-election next year, The Chicago Tribune reported.

Brown—the subject of a federal probe for years—said she’ll be able to earn a pension next year, when she will mark 20 years of service as a countywide elected official. She told the Tribune that she plans on entering the for-profit sector.

Despite the aforementioned probe, Brown won re-election in 2016 (defeating Aid. Michelle Harris and gay attorney Jacob Meister) and ran for Chicago mayor in the 2019 election, supporting Amara Enyia after withdrawing from the race. (Brown has not been charged with wrongdoing, although the newspaper noted she took thousands of dollars in campaign contributions and gifts from employees, and required employees to pay if they wanted to wear jeans on Fridays.)

HRC releases HEI; 16 Illinois hospitals cited as leaders

The Human Rights Campaign Foundation (HRC) released its 12th annual Healthcare Equality Index (HEI), which scores healthcare facilities on policies and practices dedicated to the equitable treatment and inclusion of their LGBTQ patients, visitors and employees.

A record 680 healthcare facilities actively participated in this year’s survey—with 406 of them earning a top score of 100, earning HRC’s “Leader in LGBTQ Health Care Equality” designation. In addition, the HRC Foundation researched key policies at 1,000 non-participating hospitals across the nation.

The survey noted 16 Illinois facilities as leaders. Chicago sites included Advocate Illinois Masonic Medical Center, Ann & Robert H Lurie Childrens Hospital of Chicago, Howard Brown Health, Northwestern Memorial Hospital, Rush University Medical Center, University of Chicago Medical Center and VA Jesse Brown Medical Center.

Facilities were scored in four areas. The first criterion involved the foundational elements of LGBTQ patient-centered care. The three remaining criteria were patient services and support, employee benefits and policies, and patient and community engagement. In addition, this year participants had to demonstrate that they offered transgender-inclusive healthcare benefits.

Equality Illinois looks ahead with more diverse board

BY MATT SIMONETTE

LGBT-rights advocacy Equality Illinois recently began its new fiscal year with a board of directors organization officials say better reflects the diversity of the constituency it serves.

There are 20 persons serving on the Equality Illinois Board, with 50 percent identifying as people of color; 50 percent identifying as women; 25 percent identifying as allies; and 10 percent identifying as transgender, according to CEO Bri-an C. Johnson.

“It’s really important to us that not only do we engage a diverse cross section of our community, but that a diverse cross section of our community is represented in leadership, staff and the board,” said Johnson, who added that the organization’s reasoning was twofold.

“One, it enables us to make better decisions,” he added. “We are able to focus on the right issues and we’re able to support the best policies because we have so many different voices from so many communities represented.

“Also, it’s important because we want many members of our community to be able to look at Equality Illinois and see their identity reflected in decision-making roles, and therefore deepen their confidence that we can be strong advocates for them.”

Many non-profit organizations fall back on boards of directors made up of individuals brought in because of business or political connections, fundraising abilities or generous contributions; quite often, that leads to initiatives that aren’t especially informed when engaging an organization’s signature issues, said Board Member and Equality Illinois Institute Board Chair Butch Trusty.

With a more diverse board, Trusty added, “We can really engage and bring personal experiences, knowledge and expertise to help think about the strategies of the organization, the positions that we take on particular issues, and what issues we should be elevating, rather than being about a board that is just about raising money, seeking contributions or adding things to our resume. Having life experiences or professional experiences matters for board engagement.”

Board member Reyna Ortiz, a transgender woman who is beginning her third year, said that she generally prefers the “gritty work” of activism and had turned down previous offers to join various boards—offers, she noted, that usually came via emails or text messages.

But such was not the case with Johnson’s overtures to join, Ortiz said. She praised the CEO for speaking with her on several occasions about her work, experiences and concerns, adding, “He was really trying to get a feel for where I was at.”

Johnson “felt that my connections to the community were important to the board—my connections to trans women and the groundwork that I have done, all the things that I have done in the community,” Ortiz said. “He wanted to bring that ideology and the work to the board, which I thought was super-important. So often, trans women, especially trans women of color, have been left behind and sort of abandoned by the rest of the LGBT community.”

Board member Lynne Perryman said that having board members who are relatable to their constituency “helps holistically.”

“I’m a lesbian, biracial woman in the community,” she added. “It always feels like the donors and the Capital Club members have a higher level of comfort with our decision-making when the board represents diversity that exists within our communities as well. If our communities see a diverse board, they’re going to be more inclined to donate, come to our events and support Equality’s mission.”

Johnson has been with Equality Illinois for three years, and said that diversifying the board “has been a key priority for myself and the board the entire time I’ve been here. When I came on, the board was only 25 percent people of color and 17 percent female-identified. No trans board members.”

When Johnson began his tenure, he participated in numerous fact-finding conversations across the state. He recalled that he was repeatedly told by community members and stakeholders that they didn’t think Equality Illinois could adequately represent their viewpoints.

“I can’t point to a single issue that was impeded by a lack of diversity [previously], but I can say that there were communities—communities of color, the trans community, women—who said, ‘This is not a place where we feel as represented and that we can really trust that the best decisions are being made for us,’” Johnson said.

Trusty added, “There are other organizations, not just in Illinois, but elsewhere, that want to have legitimacy and credibility on issues ... that don’t have those groups reflected in their leadership. For me, as a person of color, it is difficult for me to buy into their legitimacy on those issues.”

But with this shift, Equality Illinois “is really making a conscious effort to include the voices that are at the center of the arguments we are trying to fight for,” said Myles Brady Davis, the organization’s director of communications.

Johnson admitted that he’d like to see more representation from persons in other parts of Illinois; the organization has long grappled with challenges of extending its influence and advocacy to areas outside of Cook County.

Several staffers are originally from other parts of Illinois but, “We have a lot more work to make sure that our staff and our board reflect a more diverse cross-section of the state,” Johnson said.

“Lifting up a diverse cross-section of a community is never done,” said Board Member Reyna Ortiz.

Johnson admitted that he’d like to see more diversity in the organization but a chance to give more to the organization and the Capital Club members have a higher level of comfort with our decision-making when the board represents diversity that exists within your communities as well. If our communities see a diverse board, they’re going to be more inclined to donate, come to our events and support Equality’s mission.”

Johnson has been with Equality Illinois for three years, and said that diversifying the board “has been a key priority for myself and the board the entire time I’ve been here. When I came on, the board was only 25 percent people of color and 17 percent female-identified. No trans board members.”

Hamburger Mary’s business for sale

The popular Andersonville restaurant Hamburger Mary’s is for sale, Eater Chicago reported. SVN Chicago Commercial presented the exclusive listing for this business, according to BizBuySell.com. The listing (with an asking price of $185,000) says, “The property is located at 5400-5402 N Clark Street, Chicago, Illinois. The 5200 N Clark property consists of a two-story, hard corner space with approximately 2,350sf per floor plus basement. The 5402 N Clark building is a ground floor space with basement.”

Hamburger Mary’s is a franchise brand with sites in California, Colorado, Florida, Missouri, Nevada, Ohio, Texas and Wisconsin. A second Illinois Mary’s is currently operating in Oak Park and will remain open, according to an employee.

The chain—which first opened in 1972 in San Francisco—has previously closed restaurants in Portland and Berlin. According to ABCActionNews.com, Hamburger Mary’s closed two locations in Florida earlier this year following a hepatitis A test and an I-Team investigation. The restaurant had posted on Facebook, “Hamburger Mary’s Brandon and St. Petersburg to Close for Good by March 31 Due to the Continuing Damage to Mary’s Good Name from the False Reports of the Health Department.” Hamburger Mary’s owner Kurt King blamed the Hillsborough County Health Department for ruining his business.

However, Hamburger Mary’s International co-owner Ashley Wright told Windy City Times that the issue with the Andersonville location is rent. “We have about a year and a half left on our lease,” Wright said. “We do not own the business, and the rent in Andersonville is really high.

“For a burger place, we feel that we can only charge so much. The writing’s on the wall and we know that we have to move so, as an exploratory option, we thought we’d put the space on the market. We’d love to be in a space with a bigger dining room because our whole complex [which includes Mary’s Attic and Andersonville Brewing] is large, but our dining space is small. We’d love a bigger dining space because that’s our bread and butter—with ‘Dining with Divas’—and we’d like a bigger stage, and for considerably less rent.’

Wright also wanted to stress that “the building is not for sale and the name ‘Hamburger Mary’s’ is not for sale. Also, we’re not closing tomorrow. We want Hamburger Mary’s to stay and have a presence in Chicago; it just won’t be at that location [forever]—we know that. We don’t want to be in a position where we have to charge $18 for a burger.”

Gov. Pritzker signs pro-LGBTQ measures

On Aug. 9, Illinois Gov. J.B. Pritzker signed a number of measures—including at least three that are seen as specifically benefiting LGBTQ individuals.

HB 246 ensures the contributions of LGBTQ people are taught in public schools. It becomes effective July 1, 2020.

With state Rep. Anna Moeller (D-Elgin) and state Sen. Heather Steans (D-Chicago) as sponsors, the Inclusive Curriculum Law is an initiative of Equality Illinois, the Illinois Safe Schools Alliance and the Legacy Project, and is supported by more than 40 state education, healthcare and civil-rights organizations, Equality Illinois stated in a press release.

Also, under another measure (SB 1378), LGBTQ Illinoisans are protected from discrimination in jury service. The legislation, which was sponsored by State Sen. Toi Hutchinson (D-Chicago Heights) and State Rep. Daniel Didech (D-Buffalo Grove), passed the Illinois General Assembly unanimously, according to a separate Equality Illinois press release. Other states have similar LGBTQ-inclusive jury service non-discrimination laws, including California, Colorado, Minnesota, Oregon and Wisconsin.

In addition, SB 1379 makes LGBTQ older adults and people living with HIV target populations in aging programs funded through the federal Older Americans Act. The bill also protects all Illinoisans from discrimination in assisted living and shared housing facilities. State Sen. Ram Villivalam (D-Chicago) and state Rep. Theresa Mah (D-Chicago) are the sponsors.

This measure also takes effect July 1, 2020.
Michael Bauer reflects on a life of activism

BY MATT SIMONETTE

Activist Michael Bauer, originally an attorney and executive who has been active in fundraising in local LGBT, Jewish and women's communities since the mid-’90s, recalls vividly sitting through the inauguration of Mayor Lori Lightfoot this past May.

“We were seated with the Lightfoot and Eshleman families in the middle section of the front row,” he recalled of being with the relatives of the mayor and her wife, Amy Eshleman. At one point, Roger [Simon, Bauer’s husband of 37 years] noticed that the mayor was looking straight at me because I was crying. What a phenomenal accomplishment for the mayor.”

Bauer got on board Lightfoot’s campaign in April 2018, when he became her finance chair.

“People thought I was crazy when I talked about her becoming the next mayor of Chicago,” he said. “Part of that was, people were asking, ‘Who is she?’ The campaign was like like a roller-coaster. It was going great until Rahm [Emanuel] made the announcement that he would not run again. Then, all the big guys got in the race.”

But Lightfoot, Bauer said, “was smart, thoughtful and determined to see this through, and I told her I was committed to seeing it through by her side.”

Bauer has known Lightfoot for about 15 years but admitted he cannot remember where he first met her. Laughing, he added, “I must say, that’s true of most people I know, I do at least remember how I met my husband.”

Lightfoot was the latest in a number of prominent political candidates Bauer has put his money and support behind over the years.

“The common theme is they’ve all really been smart people,” he explained. “I really like smart people in politics. They’ve all really been smart on policy issues, and I’d be the first to tell you that I’m not. If you ask me about city issues—what should we do about economic development, transportation or pensions, for example—I’m going to look at you and have no clue.”

Bauer added that he is, first and foremost, interested in issues facing the federal government, but he recognized in Lightfoot “one of the smartest people I have ever met, so that attracted me to her campaign. … I was swept away with the notion of her being mayor of Chicago.”

Among those he has supported were Judges Tom Chiola and Sebastian Patti; U.S. Sens. Tammy Baldwin and Dick Durbin; and Ald. Tom Tunney (44th Ward). At some point he and Durbin “just clicked,” Bauer said, leading to his own activism “just getting a life of its own.” His work has centered around LGBT rights, the U.S.-Israel relationship, reproductive rights and HIV/AIDS funding.

Bauer is most proud of taking part in a campaign aimed at bringing down U.S. Rep. Phil Crane, who represented the Northwest suburbs from 1969-2005. Crane, whom Bauer described as “bitterly anti-choice and anti-gay,” was notoriously removed from his constituents and was ultimately defeated by Melissa Bean, who served 2005-11.

Bean lost once in 2002 before defeating Crane in 2004. Bauer was her finance chair in her second go-round.

“She tells Roger all the time how much she loves us,” Bauer said. “I think that’s the right word—towards people who are trans,” he said. “The hatred displays itself in everything from murders to sexual assaults to discrimination. … I’m not sure how committed the rest of the LGBT community is to understand the issues involved with that community and their rights.”

Bauer has been in poor health for the last several months. But his mother—a Holocaust survivor who recently turned 103—still offers him inspiration.

“She first had difficulty coming to terms with Bauer being gay, but Bauer said his mother, who’s now accepting of him and his marriage, exemplifies how a person evolves over time. He speaks to her several times a day.”

“Roger all the time how much she loves us,” Bauer said. “I think it’s important to understand that, just because someone has the views they do today, doesn’t mean that we should ultimately give up on them. I think a lot of people do evolve, and will evolve.”
Gay Chicago resident alleges discrimination by city employee

BY CARRIE MAXWELL

During the morning hours of April 25, Andersonville resident Leo Meere allegedly heard anti-LGBTQ comments from a Chicago Department of Water Management (DWM) employee when he was walking home from the grocery store.

Meere’s neighborhood was having the water and sewer lines replaced at the time. But that morning, one of the DWM employees’ cars turned the wrong way down a one way street and nearly hit Meere, he alleges.

“I yelled out, ‘Hey buddy, it is a one-way street,’ ” Meere told Windy City Times (WCT). “The driver responded, ‘Fuck off, homo. I am working here.’ As the car got closer, I could see the driver was wearing a yellow vest like the other city employees doing sewer line work on my block. I said, ‘You still have to follow the law. You almost hit me.’ He said, ‘Who are you to tell me what to do? It is people like you who are what’s wrong with this country.’ ”

Meere took a picture of the DWM employee’s car, which was parked in the wrong direction, to document the alleged incident. The vanity license plate had the person’s initials and last name on it. Meere said the DWM employee got out of his car and started following him down the alley toward his apartment. Meere hurried to his door because he did not feel safe anymore.

The first thing Meere did was call former 40th Ward Ald. Patrick O’Connor’s office to report the alleged incident. They asked that he email the details to them.

“It became obvious that no one in O’Connor’s office was genuinely concerned in addressing the situation,” said Meere. “Although this happened after he lost the election but before his successor, Andre Vasquez, was sworn in, O’Connor was still being paid by the city to do his job. It was very frustrating to be dismissed when I reached out to my elected official for help.”

Meere also contacted the DWM on April 25 and left a voicemail message, but said the department never called back. It was only after posting about the alleged incident on an Andersonville neighborhood Facebook page the same day that Meere was reportedly able to speak to Vasquez (whom he tagged in the post) via direct message. According to Meere, Vasquez gave DWM Deputy Commissioner Julie Hernandez his contact number; he said she called him that afternoon.

“Julie left me a voice message saying she was sorry this happened, that she would look into this for me, and I would hear back from her the next day,” said Meere. “She never called back, and did not return any of my calls over the course of the next two weeks.”

Meere said nothing more happened until he posted about the lack of a response when someone asked him for an update on the original Facebook message. He said another concerned 40th Ward citizen called Hernandez to inquire about the DWM response after the update was posted. Meere said Hernandez left him an angry voicemail message for having people “harass” her at work, and that she had already turned the matter over to DWM Director of Administration Jackie Toledo—which Meere said was a surprise to him.

When Meere called Hernandez back, he said, she never apologized and continued to yell at him. Meere then contacted Toledo, and she told him to send her the narrative and picture. He did so immediately, and Toledo said she would phone him if she had further questions.

Meere emailed Toledo back when he did not hear from her, and said she told him the matter would be sent to the Office of the Inspector General (OIG). She later gave him the name of a contact there, who he said never returned his call.

When WCT contacted Toledo’s office, the department responded that the incident was escalated to City of Chicago Inspector General Joseph Ferguson’s office for further review. City of Chicago OIG Director of Communications and Outreach Natalie A. Kuriata told Windy City Times that complaints are reviewed and assessed according to several factors to see if they will open an investigation, refer the matter to the appropriate city department or decline to investigate. These factors include the complaints’ credibility and investigative and office resources availability, among others.

“After reviewing the complaint, OIG referred it back to the DWM, where it could be more expeditiously handled,” Kuriata emailed WCT. “In addition, given the nature of the complainant’s allegation, OIG recommended that DWM counsel its employees on the City’s Diversity and Equal Employment Opportunity (EEO) Policy.”

“The DWM takes very seriously any allegations of discriminatory behavior on the part of our employees,” DWM Media Affairs Director Megan Vidis emailed WCT. “The OIG referred this matter back to the DWM and recommended EEO counseling for the employee in question, which he has received. EEO training is mandatory for all DWM employees and addresses eliminating harassment and other types of discrimination in the workplace.”

Following responses from the DWM and OIG offices, WCT reached out to Vasquez, who responded since the article initially ran. “In looking at the steps that were taken and the status of it currently, I think it is absolutely fair and important to ask what accountability there is in place for our city departments,” he said. “Language and vitriol like the type that was described have no place in our city or coming from our city workers. We want a government that is transparent, accessible and accountable. The neighbors in our city deserve that much, and we will continue to work toward that end.”

“I did not deserve to be intimidated and verbally harassed by someone who was on the clock and being paid by my tax dollars to do a city job,” said Meere. “Chicago specifically lists sexual orientation and gender identity as protected classes of people, but this government employee chose to use anti-LGBTQ slurs against me and that is not right.”

What disturbed Meere most was the way he was “brushed off every time I inquired about the matter. All I wanted was for them to do their jobs and they did not seem to want to help me. In the end, that was worse than what happened to me when that city employee hurled those anti-LGBTQ comments at me.”

Meere said that he has only lived in Chicago for two years, and that the first time he had to directly engage with city employees he was met with hostility—which is not what he thought would happen in a “supposedly pro-LGBTQ place to live.”
Paxton Pride organizer didn’t give up on hometown

BY JOSHUA IRVINE

When the first hateful comments against Paxton’s planned Pride parade appeared on the Ford County Record’s Facebook page, organizer Tyger McClure had a new problem: talking his octogenarian father out of carrying a rifle at the celebration.

Paxton—about 110 miles south of Chicago—may seem like the sort of town where one has a better chance of banning dancing than hosting a Pride parade. Its 4,400 residents, overwhelmingly white. Carhartt and camo are perpetually in vogue, and Republican primaries decide elections. Less than a decade ago, a teenager was beaten within an inch of his life for being gay.

“Anybody that’s different is harshly treated,” McClure told Windy City Times, going on to describe racist and sexist behavior inherent to the town’s culture.

And yet McClure—who has been openly gay since his early 20s—keeps coming back to Paxton. He’d visit every other weekend after he first moved to Chicago in the late ’80s, and he moved back full-time in 2010 to care for his mother, who passed in 2011.

His family moved to the town in 1969, when McClure, the fourth of five kids, was four years old. He knew he was different by the time he was seven, though he didn’t know he was gay yet. He also knew that there was no way he could talk about it to anybody.

The bullying started in high school, initially because McClure hit puberty late and looked it, but continued because of a rumor he was gay. McClure recalled an incident in his drivers’ ed class where multiple male students groped him as part of their torment.

“There were many times I wish I’d been able to be raised in even Champaign-Urbana,” McClure said.

McClure saw his first taste of a different life when he moved with a gay peer to Schaumburg in 1987. This “trial run” was his first exposure to the larger LGBTQ community; he found a job and his own place to live, and after a few months back in Paxton he moved to the city in 1988.

“I can’t imagine what it’s like for people who never left,” McClure said.

A year later, he visited home with his partner at the time and came out to his family. Well, almost all of his family: His mother told McClure he would never be able to talk to his father about it and, 30 years later, he never has.

And even in Chicago, McClure wasn’t entirely comfortable. He recalled bringing female friends to work functions in the ’90s, even though he had a partner, because of an “unwritten rule” within the company.

Things got better for McClure in Chicago as time went on; he settled in Edgewater, and went on to march and perform in Pride and the Gay Games. But Paxton was stuck in the same spot.

“It still seems like a community that wants to maintain some kind of ‘Paxton purity,’ unfortunately,” McClure said.

This year, McClure decided to tackle Paxton purity.

Organizing began only 10 days before the June 30 parade, but the makings of the parade went back to a few years before McClure moved back to Paxton, when he partook in “guerilla gay bars” that would take over a straight bar for a night. He and his Chicago friends had considered for years bringing the idea to the small towns in which many of them had grown up.

McClure obtained a permit from the mayor’s office, put the event on Facebook and bought supplies, including 150 handheld Pride flags his family helped him assemble—and one six-by-10-foot flag.

And, despite the hateful comments and an armed senior citizen, the date of the parade came.

More than 200 people ultimately marched; the Ford County Record described the community as “overwhelmingly supportive.” McClure’s lesbian niece carried the flag in the honor guard.

“This resonates a lot further than Paxton, Illinois,” McClure said.

McClure said he was overwhelmed only twice: when the editor of the Ford County Record showed him the proofs for the next day’s front page, with the Pride parade front and center; and when his dad showed up.

“It was something you wanna bottle up and just have with you,” McClure said.

The giant flag now hangs in McClure’s house, signed by the marchers. He’s planning for a follow-up march next year, although he doesn’t know how much longer he’ll continue to live in Paxton. But he’ll undoubtedly be back.

“It’ll always be home, even if I’m physically living somewhere else,” McClure said.
Goldie Goldbloom on new book, being a queer Chasidic Jew

BY CARRIE MAXWELL

Chicago author and queer Chasidic Jew Goldie Goldbloom's newest book is On Division. It centers on the life of Surie Eckstein in Brooklyn, New York and what happens to her when she becomes pregnant but decides to keep it a secret from her family. This secret becomes tangled up with another, earlier secret—the identity of Surie's son, Lipa, who is gay.

Goldbloom told Windy City Times that she wanted to write On Division because it focuses on the difficulties LGBTQ children face in religious communities.

“I never thought I would write anything about something so close to home—but once I started, I realized I had a lot to say,” she said.

This past June, Goldbloom's publisher—Farrar, Straus and Giroux—hosted a luncheon at her Chicago home to promote the book. Guests noshed on Goldbloom's homemade kosher delicacies and took home cookies from Emma's Bagel Cafe.

“We decided to hold this pre-publication lunch as an opportunity for local booksellers and media to meet Goldie in person and hear her speak about the book in an intimate setting,” said Farrar, Straus and Giroux publicist Chloe Texier-Rose.

“I have never hosted so many booksellers in my home before,” said Goldbloom. “It was fun, intimate and a warm, enjoyable time.”

Goldbloom was raised in Western Australia in a farming family. Her earliest memories involve her family's farm north of Perth, where they would sleep in old-fashioned hospital beds.

“I had to climb up on a box to get into bed,” said Goldbloom. “I used to love jumping from bed to bed and making the spring's crash. I loved putting my cold feet up on the door of the wood burning stove and getting them all toasty. It was a fantastic place and I loved it.

“When I was not north of Perth, I was south, way down in Albany, fishing with my other grandmother, who was a writer … I have always felt that the best fun can be had with your own family, and even today, my best times are spent with my family, whether born to me or chosen.”

After college, Goldbloom embarked on a career that included being an editor, contributing editor and freelance writer for a number of magazines and newspapers before becoming a published author in her 40s.

Goldbloom said what drives her to write is her innate curiosity about the world around her, “especially when there are deep problems in the world, as there are now, my mind keeps on making strange connections between the issues and possible solutions. I am a polymath, and I read widely about all kinds of unconnected things, which then become connected in my stories.”

Goldbloom lives on Chicago's North Side near Skokie, and has eight children, most of whom are now adults.

“My kids swore me to secrecy about their lives when I became a writer,” said Goldbloom. “They said that I cannot write stories about them or speak about them to the newspapers and I think that is fair. What I can tell you is this—they are a wildly eclectic, brilliant mob and I am ridiculously proud of every single one of them.”

Goldbloom added that she stayed in Chicago because she likes Lake Michigan and the “wonderfully kind and funny and real Midwesterners.”

Outside of writing her books, Goldbloom works for queer visibility in the Chicago Chasidic community.

“I am the only out queer person that I know who is still living a Chasidic life in the community,” said Goldbloom. “Queer Orthodox Jews with unaccepting families face a loss of God, hope and community.”

Goldbloom calls herself a left-wing religious person who observes all 613 mitzvos (commandments), including the way she dresses, eats and is mindful of everything she does, says and writes. Goldbloom nevertheless enjoys very ordinary pleasures.

“My idea of a fun day might be a swim in the ocean followed by a long read, and then salad on the beach with the kids as we watch the sun go down and the stars come out,” said Goldbloom.

On Tuesday, Sept. 17, Goldbloom is set to release her latest fiction book, On Division, and will hold a book launch event at 7 p.m. at Women & Children First, 5233 N. Clark St. To RSVP, visit https://www.womenandchildrenfirst.com/event/book-launch-party-division-goldie-goldbloom.
Pushing for inclusivity in children's books: One publisher shows how Orca Book Publishers of British Columbia, Canada, is an independent publisher with the goal of offering “reading material that represents the diversity of human experience to readers of all ages.” Among other titles, they have produced two of my recent favorite LGBTQ-inclusive children's books: Pride Colors, by Robin Stevenson, a bright board book for the youngest tots, and A Plan for Pops, by Heather Smith and Brooke Kerrigan, a poignant story about a two-grandfather couple and their gender-ambiguous grandchild. Publisher and owner Andrew Wooldridge was kind enough to speak with me recently about the 35-year-old company and its commitment to diverse books.

Orca had started actively looking for more inclusive stories nearly two decades ago when they launched several series geared for struggling readers, Wooldridge said. Finding authors to create diverse content “happened pretty organically,” he explained, “which is, I think, why it’s been successful.” As authors such as Stevenson and Carrie Mac (both queer parents) approached Orca, the company was “figuring out what was important” to these writers.

“Our focus has slowly become more and more about diversity and compassion and indigenous stories as well,” he said. Much of their success, he feels, comes from finding authors who can write from their own experiences. “It really is about helping them tell their stories,” he believes. When it comes to nonfiction, he said, books about subjects like Ramadan or Passover, for example, should reflect “somebody who isn’t just knowledgeable about it, but actually has lived these things. I think the same thing goes for LGBTQ content.”

For their LGBTQ-inclusive books, Wooldridge explained, they sought to include characters who would be broadly appealing and tried to avoid “really basic” coming out stories. Another important factor, he said, was offering “stories across the spectrum that present issues without bashing people over the head with them.” With A Plan for Pops, for example, “We could easily have done that book about a heterosexual married couple and it would have been a similar kind of story, but I think it’s much more effective [as an LGBTQ-inclusive story] when it doesn’t have a big billboard on it. It just lets people read it and treat it as ‘This is who we are.’ We see the same thing with presenting stories with a multicultural cast of characters without making it about somebody’s race.”

In addition to their diverse fiction books, Orca this year launched Orca Issues, a series of “critical-thinking nonfiction for teens,” tackling sometimes contentious topics such as feminism, abortion rights, and (in September) assisted dying. This didn’t mean offering a platform for bigotry, however. “It became clear pretty quickly that there aren’t two sides to a lot of these issues,” he said. “You don’t present a balanced view of something like reproductive rights or feminism because as far as I’m concerned, the way we publish, there’s only one side to these things, really.”

This approach has occasionally given rise to backlash. Stevenson had a few events cancelled over her middle-grade nonfiction book Pride: Celebrating Diversity and Community. And after her Orca Issues book about abortion rights, My Body, My Choice, came out, Wooldridge said, “I’ve seen pushback from schools who’ve said, ‘We’ve bought every other book that you’ve published, but we never will again because of what you’ve done,’ which I think means that we must be doing our job right. But in some ways, that’s why we’re doing it, to get people to actually pay attention.”

“I welcome a little bit of controversy about what we’re doing,” he asserted. “This is saying in publishing: There’s nothing better than having somebody attempt to ban a book, because it just gets the book talked about.” He added, “We have the luxury in some ways that we have a successful publishing program and can take chances on things if we’re not sure what the market looks like or what the reaction will be.

He contrasts this with some educational publishers who “publish safely so that you don’t offend anybody.” The publishers making a difference, he asserts, “are those ones who are independent and able to take the risk.” At times, he said, “You do see major publishers, some of the multinationals, taking chances on some of the things they publish, but they have to answer to somebody. I’m lucky that I don’t have to answer to anybody. So we can take a risk on some things, doing it just because we believe it’s a story that needs to be out there.”

That need remains strong, especially given the recent political climate in the U.S., where Orca sees most of its sales. Nor is Canada immune. “I see the same pressures here as well,” he asserted.

Wooldridge finds a silver lining, however. “I think one of the benefits of the current political situation in the U.S. is that it’s forcing change faster than it would have happened otherwise. We’re seeing it in the way we publish and the media we read,” he said. “Many more people are engaged now than they were four years ago and many more people are thinking about things that they never would have before.”

Wooldridge has also been motivated by his own experience helping his own three sons find diverse content and “realizing we need to be doing more of it for everybody,” he said. “The focus has really become on being as inclusive as possible, but also trying to push that as far as we can.”

Cabaret king Michael Feinstein returns to Ravinia Festival this month with singer Haley Reinhart in her Ravinia debut. Songs will span over decades of the music Feinstein is known for playing.

As the ambassador of the Great American Songbook, Feinstein has earned many accolades over the years including five Grammy nominations and two Emmy nominations. He won a Drama Desk Special Award in 1988. He's performed at The White House, Hollywood Bowl and Buckingham Palace in the past.

In 2008, Feinstein made Carmel, Indiana the headquarters of The Great American Songbook Foundation. Its mission is to preserve, research and exhibit the physical artifacts of music in an archive and reference library. The Great American Songbook refers to the standards from the 20th century in popular music and jazz. He brought the Songbook to the Pasadena POPS in 2012 where he was named principal POPS conductor, with his contract ending this year.

His memoir The Gershwins and Me: A Personal History in Twelve Songs was about him working with Ira Gershwin and he's appeared multiple times as a host on Turner Classic Movies over the years.

Feinstein called to discuss his upcoming concert and projects that are just on the horizon.

World War I might not have been truly the “war to end all wars,” but it was the war that banished attrition as a viable method of conducting armed combat. The ballistic equivalent of a staring contest, the hardships associated with stationary readiness made for more casualties on both sides resulting from disease, privation, anomic and psychological disorders than ever fell to hostile fire.

Their discomforts encompass such familiar GI blues as the lack of food, female company and news of home, along with corruption among the higher-ups, malingerers in the ranks, and the willful ignorance of civilians. Matt Foss’ adaptation shuns overt proclamations of partisanship (“I never saw a Frenchman until I was aiming a gun at them!” declares a farmer’s son) to instead convey the universality of life—and death—on the front lines so vividly that we almost forget that these forlorn frightened lads are—according our governments—our enemies.

Our empathy is escalated by Foss’ directive to producing companies recommending noncompliance with literal visual/aural representation in casting. Thus, while Remarque’s characters retain their designated identities, the Red Tape Theatre’s ensemble reflects fluidity regarding ethnic, gender and other physical restrictions. Our narrator, the sensitive Private Baumer, for example, is played by cis-female Elena Victoria Feliz, while Brenda Scott Wiazlo’s sadistic Corporal Himmelstoss barks orders in treble range and Joel Rodriguez’s sly Private Westhus stalks the latter in a wheelchair.

The walls of the bunkers where most of the action transpires are constructed from a row of pianos—objects well-suited to patrolling with silent step, scrambling atop in frenzied attack, or sheltering beneath from artillery shells exploding in bursts of spray-bottle dust. Their metaphor is extended by a soundscape incorporating evocative martial riffs from “Gimme Shelter” “Volunteers” and “Masters of War.” Visual spectacle also includes choreographed blackout creeps lit solely by flashlights and harrowing glimpses of field surgery.

The performance time may only be a fraction over 90 minutes, but by the final moments before a depressively gentle tune plays us out of the Greenhouse, we are as emotionally exhausted as if we ourselves had marched in the much-handed-down boots of weary veterans.

The Fly Honey Show

Last week at The Den Theatre in Wicker Park, The Fly Honey Show debuted its 10th season celebrating bodies, sex and queerness with a classic burlesque twist. Even the lobby was part of the celebration, featuring a set-up by Emma Alamo, a local woman who makes leather harnesses “and other hot accessories” (according to her business card) for all body types. Upon arrival, the lobby was packed with audience members waiting for the show to start.

The Fly Honey Show is a revue complete with singing, dancing and spoken acts. With witty, sexual jokes sprinkled throughout the performance and a focus on racial and social issues, there’s a little something for everyone. The songs performed included originals as well as covers of well-known songs, contemporary and classic alike. Behind the hexagon-shaped center stage was a stage with a live band.

The show was hosted by three women: Molly Brennan, Shannon Matesky (an understudy who filled in for Sydney Charles) and Mary Williamson—the “Host Trifecta.” The Host Trifecta introduced the show, the acts and performed some numbers as a trio, including Frank Sinatra’s “My Way.”

The non-burlesque acts included a stand-up routine from queer comedian Shannon Noll, a performance from transgender dancer Laksha Dantran, a poem by McKenzie Chinn and a performance from Chicago’s first all-female mariachi band, Mariachi Sirenas. Chinn’s poem, “First You Need a Body That Can Turn Into Light,” was a one-night-only act that changes for each show.

The cast is divided into The Fly Honeys (females and non-binary people) and The Hive (mascul and allies). The Fly Honeys danced to original songs and covers as well. The Hive only had one act in which they danced, clad in denim, to a mashup of the songs “Drop It Like It’s Hot,” by Snoop Dogg, and “Hot Boyz,” by Missy Elliott. My favorite act was a trio of women who danced to Def Leppard’s “Pour Some Sugar On Me” and other songs using cakes as props.

The Fly Honey Show, while educational, is very much an adult show. The show is also well-balanced; I laughed at the fun, crude sex jokes, but things also got real. Chinn’s poem had to do with racial-justice issues and consent was discussed numerous times, with the hosts reminding audience members to obtain it before touching performers (and anyone else).

Erin Killmurray created The Fly Honey Show in 2009 by Erin Killmurray in an attempt to advance gender equality. Using an intersectional feminist lens, the 2019 version of The Fly Honey Show highlights body positivity and celebrates all gender identities—specifically uplifting femme, non-binary and transgender identities. It was pleasing to see all body types and a range of skin tones on stage. “We are different kinds of bodies with different kinds of experiences,” said the hosts. “But together our hive is mighty.”

The Hunchback of Notre Dame

BY SCOTT C. MORGAN

The Hunchback of Notre Dame is not the final production of Music Theater Works artistic director Rudy Hogenmiller and founder/general manager Bridget McDonough. There's still a Lerner & Loewe revue and a ubiquitous Andrew Lloyd Webber musical yet to come before the two officially retire.

But The Hunchback of Notre Dame feels like a grand finale to the Music Theater Works tenure of Hogenmiller and McDonough. Hogenmiller directs a majestic and gloriously sung production that is remarkable for many reasons.

Music Theater Works’ Hunchback marks the musical’s professional Chicago-area premiere. And that’s amazing considering that a stage musical version of Disney’s 1996 animated feature debuted in 1999 (a German-language Berlin production ran for three years).

Yet other Disney Hunchback productions didn’t proliferate. It’s likely due to the global success of the rival 1998 French pop/rock Hunchback musical called Notre Dame de Paris.

Disney finally fashioned an English-language Hunchback for two regional tryouts in 2014 at California’s La Jolla Playhouse and in 2015 at New Jersey’s Paper Mill Playhouse. Yet Disney ultimately opted not to transfer Hunchback to Broadway.

So Music Theater Works jumped at the opportunity to lavish attention on Hunchback’s local debut. The expanded Alan Menken/Stephen Schwartz score calls for huge choral forces, and Music Theater Works obliges with a full orchestra and a powerful onstage chorus stored in a grand gothic unit set borrowed from Front Row Theatrical Rental.

Hunchback also vocally soars with a 40-plus cast. The leading standouts include Billy Dawson as the bell ringer Quasimodo, Kent Joseph as the repressed archdeacon Dom Claude Frollo, Erik Dohner as the cathedral guard captain Phoebus de Martin and Anna Marie Abbate as the vivacious Esmeralda.

Peter Parnell’s script features loads of narrators to get across Victor Hugo’s 1482-set drama of religious hypocrisy and repression of the minority Roma travelers (an element that makes Hunchback so disturbingly relevant). So Hogenmiller’s production aptly creates a storytelling ensemble who rotate in and out of small roles (including the stone gargoyles that offer advice to Quasimodo, who get downplayed compared to the huge comic relief they play in the animated film).

My only issues really with Music Theater Works’ Hunchback is that some of the performers don’t plumb the full emotional depths of their characters in their acting. And I still have qualms about the show’s origins of taking a Victor Hugo tragic novel and forcing it to fit into the mold of a Disney animated musical.

But otherwise Music Theater Works’ Hunchback is an impressive and theatrical marvel. It’s also a fitting early sendoff to both Hogenmiller and McDonough.

Lips, billed as "the ultimate in drag dining," is locating its fifth location in Chicago. The South Loop venue, opening to the public Aug. 23, includes acts such as lip-synching, live vocals, choreographed numbers, bawdy humor and campy comedy, according to a July 24 press release.

Kinley Preston, the Chicago activist, transgender showgirl and entrepreneur, is one of the Lips Chicago performers. Originally from Nebraska, Preston has been doing drag since 2011.

"[Lips] is considered a 'drag bar,' but it's definitely on the more upscale side of drag," she said.

With locations in New York City, Atlanta, San Diego and Fort Lauderdale, the Lips brand has become increasingly prominent over the past two decades. "A lot of the [Lips] girls have gone into movies, or gone onto RuPaul," said Preston. "[Lips] can open so many doors."

Preston emphasized that Lips is a dinner theater and that reservations are required, explaining, "It's not just another night at the bar; it's a ticketed event. It's produced and treated just like any other show that comes to town."

Little Goat Diner's Tom J. Schmitt is the executive chef. "All of the items on the menu are named after cast members," Preston added.

Lips also has interactive elements to the shows as well. "From the hostess to the bartender, they're all queens," said Preston. "The performers are interacting with the tables, greeting them and helping take food and drink orders."

Preston had been in contact with Lips owner Yvonne Lame (Mark Zschiesche) since 2016, before Lame came to see her perform in March 2019. "I was performing at Hydrate one night, and [Lame] came to see me and hired me the next day," said Preston. "The visions been in the making for a while."

The July 24 press release calls Lips Chicago "the grandest location yet," mentioning eight-foot crystal chandeliers, pink leopard walls, velvet curtains and an onstage throne. In a 2018 Windy City Times article, Lips co-owner Ed LaFaye said, "The whole idea behind the Lips decor was that it should look like a drag queen's jewelry box had exploded all over the room."

Preston said she assisted designer Robert Tabar with the decor of the Chicago location, adding, "Along with [performer] Tori Sass, we helped create his vision—sewing, rhinestoning, putting all the chairs and tables together. It was cool being there from the beginning, to see the transformation of it."

The Lips Chicago building was previously a Ford dealership, with reinforced steel beams on the ceiling, allowing for a big, open space to perform. All the decor was made in-house, according to Preston.

"It's like a doll house you'd see at Disney World," she said, acknowledging that the extravagant decor is gaudy, but in a luxurious, well-thought out and detailed way. "It's very grand. I've traveled all over the country, and there's very few stages that can compare to it, as far as the grandiosity of it. [The owners] put a lot of time and thought and detail into it."

Lips is different from other drag venues, according to Preston, in that the owners "care about their staff. I think that's very rare in the industry—bar/club owners that give a shit about their girls," she said. "[The owners] definitely put a lot of thought and time into the girls and making sure that they're comfortable and respected, and not exploited."

Lips Chicago will be open Wednesday through Sunday, with a different theme each night. Wednesdays are "Twisted Broadway"; Thursdays are "Dinner With The Divas"; Fridays and Saturdays are "Glitz & Glam"; Sunday afternoons are "Dragalicious Gospel Brunch," hosted by performer Ruff N' Stuff; and Sunday evenings are "Showstopper Sundays," hosted by Mimi Marks.

"Thursday night's more of their illusion night, where you're gonna see Cher, Madonna, JLo, Taylor Swift," said Preston, though she thinks the gospel brunch will be an audience favorite. "It's a lot of fun. There's gospel numbers mixed in with some high energy hits that people are familiar with."

The restaurant will initially have two back-to-back shows on Fridays and Saturdays.

Along with Chicago queens, Lips also brought some performers from other locations to feature in shows here, among them Shavonna Brooks and Aria Cassadine from Atlanta, Delilah Brooks from New York City and Gemma Stone from Fort Lauderdale.

"Entertainers have been with them for upwards of 20-plus years," said Preston. "People don't leave them, and that says a lot. [It's] not just another gig."

successful threats and demands for an exorbitant amount of money from Don Lemon. Don categorically denies these claims and this matter does not merit any further comment at this time.

This leads into yet another Fayewatch which, of course, is connected with Dunaway's disastrous Boston run of the play Tea at Five. This story isn't about Faye being fired; it's about Faye firing her assistant. According to documents filed in Manhattan Supreme Court, Michael Rocha began working as Faye's personal assistant April 5 and was paid $1,500/week. He would do her shopping, remind her to take her meds, plan her schedule and get her to places on time—so now we know who to blame. He claims that Faye called him “a little homosexual boy” and referred to people around her as “little gay people.” We don't have to take his word for it—the little one recorded Faye making the offensive comments. He went to the general manager and production's lawyer. In short order he was fired, being told that Faye “is not comfortable with you anymore.” He is suing for unspecified damages. Faye Dunaway—the gift that keeps on giving.

During my latest trip to Provincetown, I spent some time at the Ptown Art House with my pals, Well-Strung. Unlike previous years when they've been in town for the whole season, this was a one-week run. The show was kinda like their greatest hits, which was okay with me. My favorite boys playing all my favorites. What's not to like?

Also at the Art House was the luminous Liz Callaway—who has seemingly stopped time. Beyond the brilliant sheen of her voice, there is a winsome, urgent quality which draws you in. And then there's her brilliant way of connecting with lyrics and touching your soul. All in all, it may have been one of the most perfect shows I've seen in eons. Catch her whenever you have the chance and check out PtownArtHouse.com for other concerts and events.

It's definitely time for me to take a nap and end yet another column. This week, I had more stories than I could include in print. Happily, you can read all the latest dish at BillyMasters.com—the site that'll have you coming back for seconds. We didn't have room for an “Ask Billy” question, but you can ask me anything you want. Just send an e-mail to Billy@BillyMasters.com and I promise to get back to you before Faye plays Ptown. So, until next time, remember: One man's filth is another man's bible.
GT Fish & Oyster

BY JOSHUA IRVINE

Led by Michelin-starred Giuseppe Tentorri, the River North spot GT Fish & Oyster (531 N. Wells St.; GTOyster.com) offers a diverse set of seafood at an emphasized mid-range price.

The restaurant’s offerings were solidly consistent in quality, and there were standout selections, although a couple had flaws. Regarding the appetizers, the tuna poke offered plump and fresh meat, but the artfully placed pickled mango provided some needed flavor. Of the crudo trio, the tuna, paired with watermelon, lacked flavor, while the hamachi improved on the effort with the inclusion of a more flavorful cantaloupe and briny flavor. The best was the salmon, in both flavor and texture.

A fried oyster slider, however, proved to be the true standout. A smooth transition from the toasted brioche bun to the fried shellfish was accentuated by a spicy bite of kimchee and just the right hint of peanut.

Moving to entrees, roasted swordfish contributed unique flavor to the fish tacos, which offered mild but lasting heat with a satisfying late-stage crunch via pork chicharron.

Briny and flaky, the bass deserves note if only for the unusual set of gastronomic additions to the fish—most notably, smoked grape. It tasted like smoke, with a hint of fruit. The miso-cauliflower puree worked well with the fish.

The lobster macaroni and cheese had clearer reasoning behind it; the lobster added a salty touch and unique texture to a decent mac that was further bolstered by the inclusion of steamed peas.

Of the entrees, the salmon offered the most flavor, with tangy saffron sauce and almond tortellini. It was bold, original and excellent in every regard.

The duck confit, by contrast, seemed to be a safe dish, with flavorful and juicy meat accentuated by slices of spiced apple. It’s an appreciable effort by the restaurant to accommodate those more accustomed to land-based dishes.

The last dish of the night came from the dessert menu. Regarding the creamy strawberry key-lime pie with sorbet, both components were excellent, but the restaurant could consider a smaller sorbet scoop or, preferably, a larger slice of pie.

Middling aside, GT Fish and Oyster offers a more than satisfactory dining experience for seafood enthusiasts and casual diners.

::LO•TI•ON::NAME

“My stage name is LO•TI•ON but most people call me “Lo.” Long story short, my drag name came from an alter ego I had when I had to be a tough RA in college and it kind of stuck and transformed into a drag persona!”

FIRST DRAG PERFORMANCE

“My first performance was in college at an amateur show during Pride, and I did a mix of Beyoncé and Keri Hilson. I didn’t start taking drag that seriously until maybe a few years ago here in Chicago.”

GO-TO NUMBER TO SLAY A CROWD

“My go-to is my Christina Aguilera mix where the whole last half of the song is a medley of her belting out a ton of runs—I’ll never get sick of it.”

FAVORITE PIECE IN YOUR CLOSET

“For my birthday, my friend @junkmaille made me a pair of chainmaille pants that I’ve been dreaming about for the longest time and I’m in love with the piece.”

WHERE CAN WE CATCH YOU

“You can usually catch me at Berlin for either Plot Twist, which happens on the third Monday of the month, or you can find me in a rare appearance at Drag Matinee on Saturdays — both shows hosted by T-Rex.”

can croon. He has the flexibility vocally to sing any kind of pop stuff.

To me, he’s one of the most versatile and talented people on the planet. He’s a very nice and easy to work with. Unfortunately, he’s very unattractive, but other than that he’s got a lot going for him...

WCT: [Laughs] Poor thing.

MF: Yeah, my heart bleeds for him.

WCT: Tell me one fun fact about the person [who] married you and Terrence Flannery—Judge Judy!

MF: Judge Judy celebrates life. She takes nothing for granted, because this major shift in her career didn’t happen until she was 50 years old. She’s a kind person. Some people might be surprised by that because she lays it on for the television show.

One day, Terrence and I were driving to Judy and Jerry’s house in Connecticut for Thanksgiving. On the car radio, the announcer gave a list of top 10 people to not spend thanksgiving with and Judge Judy was number two. I told her about it when I got there and she asked, “Who’s number one? I don’t want to be number two!”

WCT: I didn’t realize her husband is named Jerry also.

MF: Yes, but it’s actually Gerald. He’s a judge too and one of the first authors to write a book about DNA evidence in trials. They are a brilliant couple together and their kids are all wonderful. I just performed in Wyoming and Judy’s eldest son Adam has a gorgeous house there and he threw a big party for us.

She’s also very quietly philanthropic. It’s all under the radar.

WCT: How are you friends with all these people? I mean Barry Manilow is your bestie...

MF: I was just with Barry last night. We connect because of the music. Barry, like me, cares about the history of American song. When we met we had that connection.

I just forge relationships with people that come from the heart. I have been very lucky to connect with people that I admire.

WCT: Is there one thing you would like your career to be remembered by?

MF: I think it’s folly to want to be remembered, because everything in life is so ephemeral. The only thing that matters is what we do when we are here.

I just try to keep the heritage that I embrace going. I try to keep classic American music alive, because if there weren’t advocates for it then it could get lost. I’m so proud of The American Songbook Foundation because we have our annual high school Songbook Vocal Academy where we have kids from all over the country come and are coached about American popular music. It’s like planting little seeds. These young people share it with others and it helps to keep it alive.

Helping to keep the art form alive of something that I care about is where I hope to leave my mark. Performing the material is important to me, but keeping it alive for the next generation is most important.

WCT: What are your plans for the rest of the year?

MF: I’m finishing a new album with duets with country stars such as Dolly Parton, Brad Paisley and Lyle Lovett. That will probably come out next year or late this year.

I will be conducting the orchestra at the Pasadena Symphony and POPS in September and going to Australia in November. I’m working on a book that’s due early next year, so I have to up my game.

Oh, Terrence and I will be moving into a new house in Pasadena in the fall. We have been renovating it for a year and a half. It will give me space to store my music collections, which have been all over the place!

We just opened a new Feinstein’s at Vitello’s in LA. So now he have a Feinstein’s in New York, San Francisco, Los Angeles and one opening in Indiana soon. We are announcing an international one, so continuing the nightclubs. I hope we find a space in Chicago eventually.

Tickets for the upcoming Feinstein gig on Thursday, Aug. 29, at Ravinia Festival, 418 Sheridan Rd, Highland Park, can be found at Ravinia.org.
